

made willing to travel in Truth's service and visited nearly all the meetings of Friends on this continent. Towards the latter part of his time, like one industriously engaged to perform his allotted portion of labor, he seldom missed one year without being out on a religious visit, evincing great firmness and perseverance in traveling when he believed it was required of him. —

He mentioned to a friend several months before his decease that he believed his time in this world was nearly over, and a few days after his return from his last journey he was confined at home, having been for several years previous increasingly afflicted with acute bodily pain, which he bore with becoming patience.

During his last sickness when capable of rational conversation he uttered some weighty remarks.

At one time, in conversation with some friends, in regard to the probability of his continuing here he said — "The language that has run through my mind for some time past has been, that

"by and by I shall see that peaceful shore where I shall be no more troubled." And on taking leave of a friend said — "I am in great pain, and desire to be remembered by friends, not as a forsaken soul, but as one that has hope in Jesus Christ."

He quietly departed this life at his own habitation, the 21st day of the 3rd month 1816. in the 79th year of his age. —
