

140 the church; she was zealous for the support of ^{the} disciplines, the right exercise of which she esteemed to be of great importance to the growth and preservation of our society; and remarked that in the course of her experience, she had observed where this was neglected, meetings declined. - She was often engaged in humble supplication for the preservation of friends everywhere, that by filling up their ranks in righteousness they might bring Glory to the great names. We believe it may be said of her, that she was an instrument in the divine hand, to whom the meta-phor applies, "how beautiful are the feet of those that preach the gospel of peace, and bring glad 141 tidings of good things: In her declining years she was remarka-bly preserved in the life of religion.

Her public testimonies carried with them the evidence of a mind rightly exercised in the solemn engage-ment to which she was called; her ministry was sound and at-tended in an eminent degree with the baptizing power of truth, with-out which preaching is vain. In her intercourse with society, she was affable and easy of access, and was pleased with the company of religiously inclined young people, by whom she was much beloved.
In her last illness she was confined to her room about six